25-Acre Swimming Pool Conducted in a Public Park by Syracuse Open to All the 200,000 Residents During the Summer Months

Hiawatha Lake, the municipal swimming pool in Onondaga Park, Syracuse, is an example of what can be done by the construction of such pools in the parks of this city, if the suggestion of The Evening World is carried out. Of all the municipal establishments for the comfort and recreation of the people in Syracuse, the swimming pool is the most popular.

It was opened in 1913, and thousands of the youth of Syracuse have earned to swim in it, while hundreds of thousands of citizens have found it a health-giving and refreshing relief from the heat of summer. Band concerts are given in a stand at one side of the pool and, as the pool is open evenings, the people of Syracuse are enabled to swim to the accompaniment of music, while throngs who do not care to swim congregate in the park and look on.

The pool covers twenty-five acres. It is shallow around the edges and paved with concrete as far out as wading is possible. The bottom of the deep part is paved with cobblestones. By means of a couple of outlets and intakes the water is practically kept in motion all the time.

One end of the pool is very shallow and is exclusively for the use of children. It is cut off from the rest of the pool by an abutment, on which are located the dressing rooms, water chutes and spring boards. Swimming instructors and life savers are on duty at all hours, and the total upkeep of the pool and the park surrounding costs the City of Syracuse only $5,000 a year.
